Note: Prophet Information

For Prophet lines, what is displayed is the minimum time understood that the Prophet was working, it is possible that the Prophets may have worked longer than displayed.

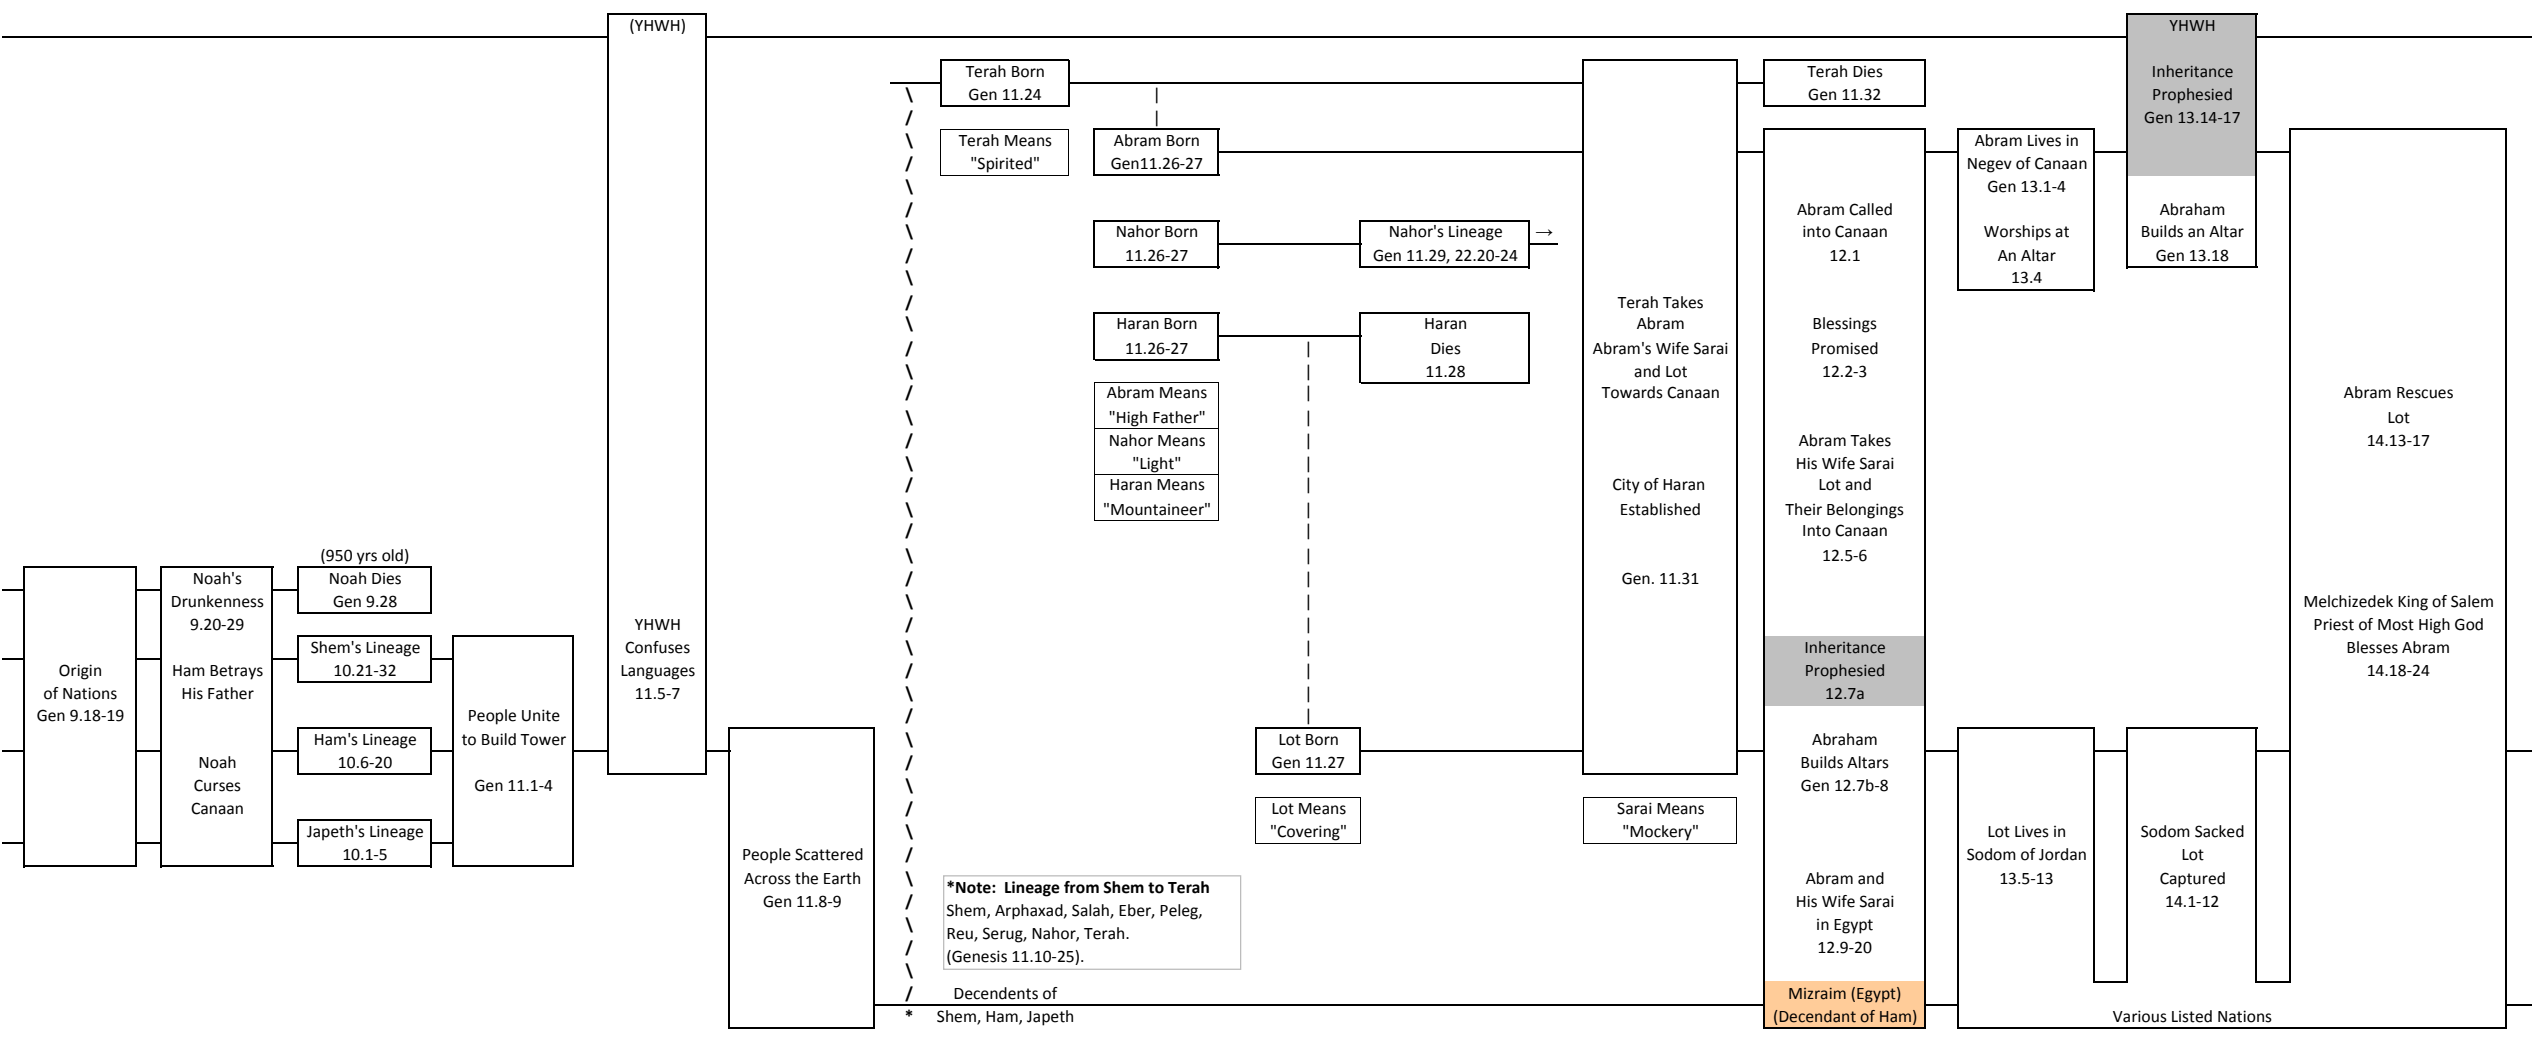

Note: Pre-Flood Manuscripts

If there were any pre-flood writings, it seems that they would have been lost during the Great Flood, unless Noah brought something other than oral tradition into the New World.

If no writings were brought into the New World, it seems that following the Great Flood concepts (e.g. righteousness) would have been first passed from generation to generation and family to family (society) via oral tradition, a verbal re-telling of significant events. Eventually, those traditions would have been written down.

As for "Biblical Writings" it seems that the actual recording and collecting of Scripture does not begin until God inspires Moses and Moses delivers that message to the Israelites during their Exodus from Egypt, giving them their national history and code of conduct (Torah).

Interestingly, it seems that Humanity does not have a concept of a "Bible" until the end of the 40-year Israelite Exile in the Wilderness. The only "Bible" the Israelite people would have had available when conquering Canaan was The Books of Moses (Torah : Genesis through Deuteronomy); this means that Joshua would not have had The Book of Joshua because he was living those events, not reading about them.

Note: Book of Job
Precise writing date is difficult, the events within Job suggest a time period around the lifetime of Jacob.
---Like Jacob, Job serves as family priest (Job 1.5), Job's wealth is measured in livestock (Job 1.3, 42.12).
---Job has about the same lifespan as Jacob; Job lived 140 years (Job 42.16), and Jacob lived 147 years (Gen 47.28, 49.33).

While there are some scholars that argue for a Post-Babylonian Exile composition for The Book of Job, it seems that this argument neglects oral history and/or the possibility of transmission through an early version of the written Hebrew language. This gives insight into the Earliest Possible Recording.
